EXECUTIVE SUMMARY:

- Training: Interdisciplinary training in genetics, epidemiology, and neurodegenerative disorders.
- Research: My research program investigates how genetic, environmental, and social drivers of health jointly influence the risk and progression of Alzheimer's disease (AD), with the goal of developing predictive models to support personalized approaches to dementia prevention. A central focus of my work is understanding why AD disproportionately affects underrepresented populations and how racial and ethnic differences in health exposures influence disease outcomes. I bring more than a decade of experience applying genetic epidemiology to large, deeply phenotyped cohorts to identify causal pathways linking genetic and environmental factors to AD. My program integrates longitudinal cohort data within epidemiologic frameworks to determine how modifiable exposures affect clinical trajectories, biomarker profiles, and cognitive decline. In parallel, I leverage statistical genetics methods—including genome-wide association studies, genetic correlation, polygenic risk scoring, and Mendelian randomization—to quantify genetic contributions to AD risk and evaluate how these effects vary across environmental contexts.
